ENTANGLED OTHERS: FEILEACAN MCCORMICK AND SOFIA CRESPO

Entangled Others is the shared studio practice of artists Feileacan McCormick and Sofia Crespo. Their work focuses on ecology, artificial lifeforms and generative arts, with an emphasis on giving the more-than-human new forms a presence and life in digital space. This involves exploring questions of relationship, biodiversity, and awareness through biology-inspired technologies. They highlight how through conscious efforts, new technology can be used to bring attention and awareness to the unseen, with which we are tightly interwoven. Entanglement is a complex state, one where no single entity can be said to be separate or unaffected by any other. We cannot consider ourselves without others, act without interacting, or speak without being heard.

They have both explored the mosaic-screen technique as an unconventional narrative direction in their first film together, Small Hours.

PADRAIG CUNNINGHAM

Padraig Cunningham's work examines physical displacement in the environment. Within this dislocation, themes of loss and absence become apparent often centring on everyday places, their reinventing and questioning their status, usage, and how they have been altered to accommodate human engagement. Implied in this alteration is nostalgia, a longing for what has been lost. The open receptive nature of the work is an attendant to that absence.
